Australian accounting standards are based on IFRS Standards. While there has been some debate around certain standards, overall the transparency of financial results has been important to users in managing their way through the global financial crisis and the volatility resulting from ongoing disruptions. Of course, accounting standards continue to evolve. Understanding and keeping up with on-going revisions and amendments is an important responsibility for commercial entities. The Australian Accounting Standards Board (AASB) is an Australian Government agency that develops and maintains financial reporting standards applicable to entities in the private and public sectors of the Australian economy. Also, the AASB contributes to the development of global financial reporting standards and facilitates the participation of the Australian community in global standard setting. The AASB's functions and powers are set out in the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act. The current account is always offset by the capital and financial account so that the sum of these accounts – the balance of payments – is zero. The logic underlying this, and represented in the double-entry accounting framework, is that the value of whatever is traded (recorded in the current account) is offset by a movement of some form of asset to pay for it (recorded in the capital and financial account). Australia has tended to borrow from overseas, reflecting investment in the Australian economy.
